

In God's Loneliness

In the beginning, before creation, God was alone, lonely and bored. He dealt with His boredom by imagining things, creating things in His mind such as the Universe. So, in His loneliness, since He could not create other gods with whom to relate, in His mind, He created man in His own likeness. Projecting Himself into man's mind, He made him capable of sharing His boredom and loneliness. He created living creatures and presented them to man. But these were found to be lacking and could not truly relieve loneliness, as God said: "It is not good for man to be alone," thereby expressing His own feeling. Therefore God created for the man a likeness of him, a suitable companion who could share and help relieve his loneliness: the woman.

The man soon forgot his given purpose of relieving God's loneliness being fixated on his own loneliness, relating with the woman. And she, created in the likeness of the man, also fixated on her own self, her own loneliness, thus competing with God for the attention of the man.

At the time of Noah, God concluded that Mankind was no better than the animals as they ignored His loneliness being completely lost in their own selfish objective. Hence, God brought about the flood in order to start over seeing that man's intellect proved to not be sufficient without instruction and guidance.
